Conditional Friends.—A person who was at mortific empiry with one of his neighbours, fell ficks and being given over, sent forme senary, that they might e reconcided. "Ad", sant hey might ind, very had indeed dive think 1 shart due?" "Why I impe not," replied its visitor—the same you are very bad, but for all that, perhaps you are very bad, but for all that, perhaps you are very bad, but for all that, perhaps you are very bad, but for all that, perhaps you are very bad, but for all that, perhaps you are very bad, but for all that, perhaps you are very bad, but for all one of the outer, "I shall dir; and so I have sent for you that I may not go out of the world in ennuts with any one. So d'ye see, we'll us friends. The quarre between us is all over, all over, and so give me your hand." Accordingly this token of re-concidiation was performed, and the o-ther took his leave, when just as he was cred out, "Jut stop, stop, if I should and the this fime, this is to go for noth-ing! mind now—It's all to be just as it was before, if I do not die!"

Predattry reproced.—A young man who was a student no use of our colleges being very vain of his knowledge of the Latin language, embaced every oppor tunty that offered of uttering short sen tences of Latin before his illiterate com-panigns. An uncle of his, who was a sca-faring man, having just arrived from a long voyage, invited his nephew to vis-it him on beard his ship. The young renterman went on bowed, and be an un-gentleman went on bowed him on the shoul-der, and pointed to the windlass, asked "Quid est hoc?"—His uncle, being a man who despised such vanity, took a chew of tobacco from his mouth, and throwing it in his nephew's lace, replied, "Hoc est quid."

Two gentlemen having a dispute abou religion, one said to the other, "I won-der, sir, y-u should talk about religion and 1'lh hold you ten gunness you con-say the Lord's Frayer." "Done," and the other. The money was depaired and the gentleman began with 'I believ in God," and so went circursly through the Creed. "Well," said the other," "are I have loss J did not think you could nave done it."

A Bailor's Break fast.—A sailor being on deck one windy moning, a sudden gust took him into the seas but putting out ropes he regained the deck; his cap-tain sympathised with him, observing he had an indifferent breakfast. ~O not so bat," replied the sailor, ~1 had a good duck."
